

Northwestern Mutual Celebrates Asian American and Pacific Islander Heritage Month with Tips for Financial Security

Majority of Asian Americans Have Financial Goals but Need a Plan to Achieve Them

MILWAUKEE, May 10, 2016 /PRNewswire/ -- Recent studies* show 54 percent of Asian Americans hold at minimum a bachelor's degree, making them the most educated ethnic group in the U.S. As a result, Asian Americans are yielding better-paying jobs, yet incurring greater educational debt than the rest of the population. Northwestern Mutual celebrates Asian American and Pacific Islander Heritage Month by revealing key insights into the financial beliefs and habits of Asian Americans and offering ways they can improve their financial futures.

"We believe everyone deserves financial security and the chance to achieve their piece of the American Dream—however they define it," said Rick Hu, financial advisor and managing director at Northwestern Mutual. "Our goal as financial professionals is to help guide individuals and families along the path of achieving their financial goals and dreams in ways that are meaningful to them and aligned with their cultural values and identity."

Key findings from the research reveal contradictions among Asian Americans and their finances:

Asian Americans are more likely than non-Asians to be better educated and earn more. Yet fewer than half feel they are successful in their lives right now.

More than 7 in 10 Asian Americans agree they are responsible for their own financial success; and two-thirds are confident they can manage their money. Yet only 1 in 3 have a written financial plan, while only 1 in 4 has met with a financial professional.

Younger Asian Americans (ages 18-29) are most likely to believe that an inheritance is a form of financial success.

The insights represent an opportunity for Northwestern Mutual to help bridge the gap for Asian Americans with educational tools and resources to help empower them in their financial journeys.

1. Financial success starts with personal success

Personal success often translates into professional success. A positive cultural identity, staying rooted in culture, customs and family, makes it easier to share your successes with others. This also helps you teach others about how to best plan for the future.

2. Education and planning lead to financial freedom

Education has traditionally been the backbone of progress. And seeking education about your financial options will help you progress personally and financially. Just like the choice of what field to study, planning now will only lead to successes later. Whether it's as simple as plotting out a financial roadmap or as involved as setting a budget for each step of your life, planning is always a step in the right direction.

3. Make your plan work for you

Focusing on financial security is sometimes easier said than done. That's why financial experts are available to help you plan for the future, at any stage of your education or income level. A personalized financial plan can help position you for future financial success.
