This holiday season, are kids spending wisely or wildly?

MILWAUKEE (BUSINESS WIRE), December 19, 2011 - When it comes to holiday spending this season, 82% of kids (17 years old and younger) say they have the same amount to spend this year as last, but they are split down the middle as to whether they will spend wisely or wildly. Over half (52%) of kids say they do not plan to establish a budget for their gift-giving to friends and family, while 46% are planning to set a budget, according to the latest poll released by Northwestern Mutual Foundation's financial literacy website, Themint.org.

The kids who don't plan to set a budget (52%) will "see what [they] find for family/friends and then buy it if it is right" while for those who have set a budget, 21% plan to buy gifts only for family members and 24% will buy gifts for family members and close friends too.

"While kids may have maintained their spending power year-over-year, they are not empowering their spending by planning first," said Rebekah Barsch, Northwestern Mutual vice president - market strategy. "The holiday shopping season is a teaching moment about the power of planning and how it leads to financial security, which in this case is staying within your means while still being able to purchase gifts for everyone on your list."

Kids' spending plans echo those of the adults around them. Northwestern Mutual conducted a recent Facebook poll which found 52% of people will create a spending plan for their gift buying this holiday season and they intend to stick with those plans.

"Lots of kids have a 'piggy bank' in some form, which is great first step, yet parents can go further and provide lessons about how to plan and use that cash. Otherwise kids are doing little more than just raiding their savings and spending with abandon, missing an important opportunity to learn how to think first, prioritize and build good financial habits early on," said Barsch.

Themint.org offers a number of free resources to help kids learn more about saving and spending, including tips on How to Shop Smart, and an interactive quiz: What kind of spender are you?
