

Families planning ahead and strategizing 'Back to School' spending

MILWAUKEE, Sept. 26, 2012 /PRNewswire/ -- While back to school spending is up over last year, results of a new Northwestern Mutual poll found a majority of families are implementing strategies to manage the costs. The poll results were captured on Themint.org – the Northwestern Mutual Foundation's kid-friendly financial literacy website.

Recent data from the National Retail Federation found that the average American family spent $688.62 on back to school items in 2012, up 14.1 percent over last year. Even with spending up, Northwestern Mutual's results show families are sticking to a budget – more than half (53 percent) of families limited their spending to under $250 per child.

"Our poll results tell us families are aware of the costs and are planning to be more strategic with their dollars," said Elizabeth Taylor, director of specialty markets at Northwestern Mutual.

When asked about money-saving strategies used frequently during this year's back to school shopping season, the poll found that:

Nearly half (48 percent) of families used a combination of methods for saving including: clipping coupons, comparing prices online, re-using materials from previous years, and holding off on shopping until items go on sale.

Nearly half of all shoppers (47 percent) said they always look for opportunities to cut costs on back to school items, while only two percent said they don't go out of their way to save money.

"I find that shopping as a family is a great way to talk with kids about how to make smart money decisions," said Taylor. "I use it as a practical lesson with my kids to demonstrate how to stretch your dollars so you can buy both the items you need and want, while sticking to a budget."
