"We're extremely proud of our internship program, which we consider a cornerstone of our recruiting efforts and one of the key drivers behind our long track record of being able to attract exceptional talent to the company," said Steven C. Mannebach, vice president – field growth and development at Northwestern Mutual.

Mannebach added that the company's program is a win-win for both the company and its interns.

"We're able to offer a real world and unique experience to candidates, which we believe is the most valuable way to learn and grow in a career that can last a lifetime. At the same time, we get an opportunity to find and train the best and the brightest early in their careers," Mannebach said.

Vault is a leading provider of information for students and professionals who are pursuing and managing their careers. Each year, Vault's editors evaluate hundreds of internship programs and select ten that they feel provide the best all-around experience. Many factors are considered, including: mentorship availability, career advancement opportunities, intern involvement/capacity for learning, compensation, and industry clout and work culture.

Vault noted that 98 percent of the Northwestern Mutual interns they surveyed found the program to be instrumental or very helpful to their future careers.

The Northwestern Mutual internship program was launched in 1967, and offers both hands-on training and real-life experience. Many of the company's most successful financial representatives and nearly half of its senior field management are former interns.

This year, Northwestern Mutual embarked on its largest recruiting effort in its 155-year history, and is on target to add more than 2,000 financial representatives and 3,000 financial representative interns. The large-scale recruiting effort is taking place at a time when the national unemployment rate is high, and many other industries are either holding steady or scaling back on hiring.
